

When it rains, a thin layer of mist gathers on the glass. We often draw something on it without thinking: a name, a flower, a face, or simply a line. These marks have no particular purpose and never remain for long, but one mark often leads to another.

Condense

Jianuo Xuan

Condense grows out of this small habit. Thoughts move in a similar way: one word appears, brings other words and new images with it, then slowly fades.